Philips Laser Mfd 6050 Drivers 26 .The Baculovirus Expression Vectors Volume 5, Issue 2

Brian Hall's description of the Baculovirus vectors is well written and may serve as a review of the application of these biologics in the production of recombinant products. The main benefits of the Baculovirus expression vector are that it offers high capacity (up to 8 mg of foreign protein per mg of eukaryotic protein) and at least one species is available (as the Autographa californica nucleopolyhedrovirus) that is readily adapted to eukaryotic systems. The virus can be used to express foreign gene products, and even to vector proteins into cells. Unlike many other vectors, baculoviruses are highly pleiomorphic, which makes it relatively easy to adapt them to yield foreign proteins and foreign gene products (needing purification of the virus will be much simpler). Although the viruses are highly insect specific, human cells have receptors that allow them to infect efficiently. The viruses are insect-specific, which makes all the nonhuman cell (murine) infections extremely inefficient. The baculovirus expression vectors are not all the same, but the original vectors have been used successfully to express a wide range of foreign gene products, including biotechnologically useful proteins such as low-density lipoproteins (Chiari, 1995). Some of the potential applications discussed by Hall include: Ex vivo. For ex vivo use as a vaccine in humans, the most important parameter is the level of immune response. To achieve this, it is not the amount of foreign protein itself that is important, but the level of expression of the protein (Yockey et al., 1998). An expression system that can generate significant amounts of protein at a reasonable cost would be the most attractive. One method to achieve this is by incorporating the gene into a baculovirus vector. In vivo. The most important consideration in using baculovirus vectors for in vivo studies is safety. The safety of administration has been demonstrated by virtue of the fact that no animals inoculated with baculovirus-derived vectors have developed any adverse reaction (Schuz et al., 1998). The recent approval of recombinant baculov
